THE FARMING INTEREST. There is no vocation that advances civilization half so much as a

The profession of medicine has no greator necessity for a thorough knowledge of chemistry than the science of the party than the science of the branches aught in our public school course. The farmer who was the fertilizers from the stable and hen house, reaps his reward from the vast amount of ammonis which these articles contain. If he puts ashes on his farm, especially on his fruit and potations, he is rewarded by the potash his land has gained from the ashes. But he mixes ashes and stable manuratogether he gets no benefit from either, because potash and ammonia form, an insoluble compound. All vegetable matter contains ammonia. Lime will'set it free toric the use of plants. Lime contains no fertilizing principle in itself, but enables the crop to appropriate the natural fertility of the soil, so that it can be utilized. The farmer should'study the habits of insection to where they stood. One of them was killed out-right, and the other so stunned that she was with difficulty restored. Your corresponded against a five the party of the soil, should have been published and generally known long ago, though and elevator or a woolen mill is want-detected. I now take the opportunity of disseminating the information fertilizing principle in itself, but enables the crop to appropriate the natural fertility of the soil, so that it can be utilized. The farmer should'study the habits of insects as quite a number of the bugs and worms may easily be destroyed even before they have damaged the crop, if rightly understood. A great many birds that we think very destructive, destroy more worms that are injuring the fruit crop than they destroy fruit, there by being a source of real profits in stiffening the fence, letting a few inches at the farmer. WHY FARMERS SHOULD AVOID KEEPING 1908 ANIMALS.

There are too many horses kept on the farm, perhaps not too many when their combined ability to do the work required of them is estimated, but too many in numbers, this being rendered necessary by want of adaptability to do the work awaiting them. To keep six horses to do the work that might be done by four is very poor econhorses to do the work that might be done by four is very poor economy, to say the least. Thus, a horse that lacks in a total of weight for a given piece of work many consume as much food as one whose weight enables him to do the specified work with great case. This would come of the better formed horse having, not only the proper bone development and well-rounded-out muscles where he needed them, but corresponding vigor in his digestive and assimilative powers. Then, again, two draft-horses of, say 1,400 pounds each, might so vary in their forms as to easily make a difference of one-fourth of make a difference of one-fourth of talists did not put their money in

The breeding of horses fit for fast work, in some degree, has been brought up to a better point. Unquestionably the breeding of draft horses has, to say the least, kept fully absent of the other. This is shown by the fact that not more than one well-bred drafthorse intwenty falls to move with case any load that is adapted to his size and weight, while not more than one in twenty thoroughbred or trotting-bred horses come up to the expectations of those engaged in breeding them. This is, of course, a random estimate, but is it not in either case under, rather than over-stated? Predicating an opinion upon these facts it. than over-stated?
